Monthly commentary

- Global markets experienced a more volatile backdrop in July as rising geopolitical tensions and concerns around the inflationary impact of higher energy prices pushed government bond yields higher. While equity market leadership broadened beyond the largest technology stocks, performance diverged considerably across regions and styles. In sterling terms, UK equities were among the strongest-performing major markets, while emerging markets and US equities weakened over the month. Global government bonds also struggled as investors reassessed the outlook for interest rates and inflation.
- Against this backdrop, the Fund benefitted from its diversified equity exposure and specialist asset holdings. Within developed equities, quality-oriented strategies were the largest contributors. UK equities were a notable source of support, with several UK-focused holdings benefitting from the strength seen across both large and smaller companies during the month, helping offset weakness elsewhere. Conversely, growth-oriented strategies detracted as technology and semiconductor-related stocks sold off sharply. Extremely high valuations and investor positioning left parts of the market vulnerable to a rapid reversal in sentiment, particularly across AI-related and momentum-driven areas.
- Emerging market equities were a headwind, reflecting a challenging month for the broader asset class as technology and semi-conductor related stocks, particularly in South Korea, came under pressure. However, the impact was partially mitigated by the Fund's active strategies, several of which had limited exposure to these areas and were instead underweight some of the weaker segments of the market.
- Specialist assets were among the strongest contributors, benefitting from strong performance across infrastructure, property and parts of the private equity allocation, with improving sentiment towards UK-listed real assets and investment trusts helping to narrow discounts in several areas. This provided a useful source of diversification at a time when returns within traditional equity markets became increasingly dispersed.
- Fixed income returns were more mixed. Higher government bond yields weighed on sovereign bond exposures, particularly longer-duration holdings, while credit markets proved relatively resilient.
- Overall, the month highlighted the benefits of diversification across asset classes, regions and investment styles during a period of heightened market volatility and increasing return dispersion.
